Inside Public TV

Focus on Learning: NCPT Now UNC-TV

You've probably noticed the new look that debuted during our station breaks last fall, featuring lively graphics, inviting music, and an important message, "Learning for a Lifetime." To go with these exciting changes, we've also adopted a new (and possibly familiar, for long-time viewers) name: University of North Carolina Television (UNC-TV).

It's not unusual for broadcasting stations to freshen their images from time to time. This latest effort was designed to focus on the lifelong learning opportunities that make public television in North Carolina a uniquely valuable resource to all of the state's residents.

Our new look also offers an excellent opportunity to spotlight the institution that makes the statewide public television network possible. The University of North Carolina system was the driving force behind the creation of public television in our state in January, 1955 — nearly four decades ago.

As the statewide public television system expanded, its name became the University of North Carolina Television Network or UNC-TV Network, sometimes called University Television. In 1980, The University of North Carolina Center for Public Television was established by the UNC Board of Governors to streamline operations and bring all production under one roof.

Adopted in the mid-'80s, our promotional name North Carolina Public Television reflected our public television service, yet diminished our association with the university. At a time when education is more crucial than ever to the state and the nation, it seems especially appropriate to reestablish our close relationship with North Carolina's preeminent educational institution.

So, in putting our new image together, we have reclaimed one of our former promotional names, University of North Carolina Television, or UNC-TV. But whatever the name, our mission — to offer North Carolinians lifetime learning opportunities and a statewide forum to examine vital issues — remains the same.

UNC-TV's Garner to Host North Carolina This Week

The new year also brings a new host to our long-running, state-oriented public affairs series North Carolina This Week. Beginning Jan. 1, Bob

Bob Garner

Garner takes over as moderator/host from Jack Aulis, who has left to pursue other projects. Garner, a UNC-TV public affairs producer/director for the last three years, has also served occasionally as a panelist on the series.

A native of eastern North Carolina, Garner formerly worked as a reporter/anchor/producer at WFMY, Channel 2 in Greensboro. "Jack Aulis has left some big shoes to fill," says Garner, "but I'm comfortable with this type of format and looking forward to it."
